

I support maintaining, at minimum, the existing rules to prevent undue concentration in the media arena.

To be frank, I do not believe the FCC has done enough to increase diversity of views in this area--even the existing rules are already too permissive.

It is almost impossible to find any but boilerplate political views on TV (including cable). All the coverage, with minor exceptions, appears to have been written by the same hand. As a result, the American people are both under-informed and misinformed.

To further extend this virtual monopoly would be a disservice to democracy. Stand fast!
